

Referees

In determining which manuscripts to publish, the IBM Systems Journal follows the practice of most professional journals: peers of authors serve as referees to review manuscripts. Three or more referees evaluate each manuscript during a review for which usually at least one of the referees is not affiliated with IBM. The recommendations of the referees provide critical advice for the decision on whether to publish a manuscript.

Referees voluntarily contribute their time and expertise to ensure the validity and value of manuscripts selected for publication. As a direct result, readers are presented with worthwhile material that meets the criteria of the Journal. Reviews by the referees are anonymous when given to authors so that those offering advice, criticism, or comments about the manuscripts can be candid. This procedure is intended to maintain objectivity, but it also limits the recognition that referees receive for their vital work.

Because of their importance to our publication process, we periodically express our appreciation publicly to the referees. Thus, on behalf of our contributors and readers, we thank those listed below, who served as referees and completed reviews from March 1989 through March 1993. We apologize for any inadvertent omissions.
