

Referees

The IBM Systems Journal, like other professional journals, uses peer review as part of the process of determining which manuscripts to publish. In reviewing the manuscript of a paper, three or more referees provide an evaluation; at least one of the referees is not affiliated with IBM. Referees also evaluate the manuscripts of essays and technical forum articles.

The referees voluntarily contribute their time and expertise to provide extremely valuable advice concerning a manuscript. They focus mainly on its validity, its value to our readers, whether it should be published, and how it might be improved by the authors. The referees are anonymous to the authors so that they can offer candid advice and criticisms about the manuscripts. Although this procedure is intended to foster objectivity, it limits the recognition that the referees receive for their vital work.

Because referees are so important to our publication process, we publicly express our appreciation periodically to our referees. On behalf of the contributors and readers we sincerely thank those listed below, who served as referees in completing reviews from March 1993 through March 1997. If a referee from this period is not listed, the omission is inadvertent, and we apologize for the oversight.
